

The Roadmap to Impact* Keynote Collection

The Day One Leadership perspective is built on a single foundational principle: leadership can be defined as powerful moments of interpersonal impact. Every one of our presentations shows your audience how to consistently create those powerful moments, recognize them as leadership, and make them a non-negotiable part of each day moving forward. Leadership is impact, and our presentations provide the practical, easy-to-implement roadmap to that impact.

Focusing on leadership as individual moments of impact allows us to teach a form of personal leadership to which everyone can aspire. Our “Roadmap to Impact” presentation series was designed to stay true to our personal leadership expertise while providing you with the flexibility to identify the development focus that best fits your organization’s unique needs. We’ve created six presentations worth of practical and compelling leadership strategies, including deep dives into the core leadership values of impact, growth, courage, empowerment, class and self-respect.

These six values form the foundation of all Roadmap to Impact content, with a pair of foundational presentations available to provide an overview of the Day One Process, and four associated values-based presentations that dive deeper into the specific values within the test.

Foundational Presentations

The Leadership Test: Six Questions that Change People and Organizations

This is Day One: Creating Cultures of Leadership

Values-Based Presentations

Courage: Leadership Impact in Action

Self-Respect: The Foundation of Leadership

Growth and Empowerment: “The Game” Has No Winners

Impact and Class: Elevate Don’t Escalate

Much like the Marvel Universe concept, each presentation can stand on its own but offers connections to others that can provide a more focused exploration of key skills. This allows you to choose a single keynote that provides your audience a powerful tool for recognizing and living their leadership, or two or more interconnected presentations that focus on the areas of greatest need for your organization. With a full suite of live and virtual options, we can customize an ongoing development plan for your organization that ensures real behavioural change in your audience. Below are more detailed descriptions of each presentation. Set up a free, no-commitment consultation with our team today to discuss the best fit(s) for your audience.

FOUNDATIONAL PRESENTATIONS

The Leadership Test: Six Questions that Transform People and Organizations

- For a video Introduction to the presentation from Drew click here.
- For a short video trailer for the presentation click here.
- For audience reactions to the keynote click here.

Drew's most popular TED talk, "The Lollipop Moment" focuses on the power of individual moments to change lives for the better. However, the "Lollipop Moment" was an accident—its impact was unplanned. This keynote shows audiences how to be more conscious and consistent in creating those powerful moments of leadership. If your interest is in exposing the audience to the primary themes of that TED Talk, this keynote is an ideal choice.

The Leadership Test is the key tool for behavioural change in the Day One Leadership process. Rooted in behavioural psychology, The Leadership Test leverages the brain's discomfort with unanswered questions to drive impactful daily leadership behaviors. Six core leadership values and their associated questions are used to demonstrate the process:

IMPACT – What have I done today to recognize someone else's leadership?

GROWTH – What have I done today to make it more likely someone would learn something?

COURAGE – What did I try today that might not work but I tried it anyway?

EMPOWERMENT - How did I help someone else move closer to a goal today?

CLASS - When did I 'elevate instead of escalate' today?

SELF-RESPECT - What did I do today to be good to myself?

This keynote begins by highlighting the source of the audience's hesitation to embrace leadership as a key piece of their identity before sharing the story of the development of The Leadership Test. Through this story the audience is provided with real-life examples of leadership as individual impact, the psychological research behind the test and the rationale for the six key questions above. Depending on the time available, you will be able to identify up to two of the core values for additional focus. The keynote ends with a call-to-action for each audience member to embed just one of the questions into their daily behaviour for the subsequent 30 days.

The foundational keynote for the "Roadmap to Impact" series, The Leadership Test has been delivered as a standalone keynote at hundreds of events, and increasingly as the context-setting introduction for the more specialized values-based presentations. For example, over the past 3 years, The Leadership Test was often coupled with our Self-Respect keynote (as a bookend keynote, a concurrent session, or a follow-up engagement) as clients recognized the post-pandemic impact wasn't dissipating quickly. In addition, since our emergence from the pandemic, our Courage keynote has become increasingly popular as a follow-up as we move into a new, uncertain reality of work.

Audience takeaways may include*:

- The source of their hesitation to identify themselves as leaders
- A reframing of leadership as a daily choice rather than an acquisition of titles and accolades over time

- The framework of “The Leadership Test”: an easy-to-apply approach to more consistently engaging in positive leadership behaviours
- Strategies for more effectively embodying the values of impact, courage, growth, empowerment, class and self-respect on a daily basis.

Specific content may vary based on time and customization factors.*

Potential Keynote Summary for External Use in Event Programmes or Websites:

“How many of you are completely comfortable with calling yourself a leader?”

Leadership author and educator Drew Dudley has asked that question to thousands of audiences around the world, and in fewer than 1% of those audiences were the majority of people willing to call themselves leaders. That’s a problem, and this session will focus on how to solve it.

In this engaging and empowering keynote, Drew aims to demonstrate that there is a form of leadership to which we should all aspire: one that is driven by a daily commitment to acting on six key leadership values: impact, courage, growth, empowerment, class and self-respect.

Drew will provide six simple questions that comprise “The Leadership Test”, and while the questions may be simple, the behavioural changes they generate build better careers, stronger organizations, and more fulfilling lives. A commitment to passing “The Leadership Test” turns those six values into more than just words, and changes how you treat yourself and the people around you.

Sharing stories from small town Canada to the deserts of Qatar, and insights from leaders of all types-- CEOs, elite athletes, cab drivers, custodians and everyone in between—this presentation will change the way you think about leadership in your life and workplace.

This Is Day One: Creating Cultures of Leadership

- For a video Introduction to the presentation from Drew click here.
- For a short video trailer for the presentation click here.
- For audience reactions to the keynote click here.

Like The Leadership Test, this presentation is focused on the importance of recognizing individual moments of impact as leadership behaviour. The key difference is this keynote has a more pronounced focus on helping the audience identify and act on their personal leadership values. Research shows that people who understand their personal values and feel they can live them through their work are prouder of their organizations, more engaged and productive in their work, and far less likely to leave their jobs. Most importantly they feel happier and more empowered as leaders and as people.

The presentation begins with a series of reflective hypotheticals designed to have the audience assess their personal leadership philosophy (the benefits to which are outlined in the session description below) and the leadership values they use to make key personal and professional decisions. This reflection generally demonstrates there is room for improvement on their own personal value clarity and the alignment between their values and behaviour. The Leadership Test is then provided as a tool for embedding behaviour that aligns with their values until that behaviour becomes an unconscious habit.

Creating Cultures of Leadership asks for more self-reflection from the audience and dives deeper into the research behind the Day One Leadership approach and its impact on personal organizational leadership culture. This makes it an ideal choice for managers, senior leadership and other culture creators within the organization. It is also an excellent fit for audiences who respond best to presentations with a focus on skill acquisition or events where the expectation is presentations will provide specific professional development outcomes.

Audience takeaways may include*:

- A recognition of the importance of developing and communicating a personal leadership philosophy
- Increased clarity on their personal leadership values
- A greater understanding of the link between personal value clarity and personal pride, engagement, productivity and happiness
- An introduction to the concept of values-based decision making and its benefits
- A step-by-step process to more effectively identify and “operationalize” key leadership values (both individual and organizational)

Specific content may vary based on time and customization factors.*

Potential Keynote Summary for External Use in Event Programmes or Websites:

In this practical and provocative keynote, leadership will be reframed as a daily choice rather than a set of titles or accolades gained over time. Drew shows that treating each day as if it is “Day One” of your leadership journey results in a stronger daily commitment to acting on your core personal and organizational values. Individuals who achieve clarity on--and commit to--their personal values:

- Rate 110% higher on overall leadership effectiveness than those who do not
- Are rated 140% higher by those they lead than those who do not
- Have teams with higher levels of commitment, pride, and productivity
- Rate 135% higher on measures of trust

Drew will walk you step-by-step through the discovery of your personal leadership values, demonstrate how those values can be translated into daily behaviours, and show how values-based decision-making leads to individual and organizational success.

At each stage, Drew will draw on 15-years of personal leadership stories and insights to show how this process led him through battles with alcohol, obesity, and personal tragedy. Honest, engaging, and above all practical, this presentation will help you understand what your Day One needs to look like, remind you why you're a leader, and make clear what you can do to be a better one, starting today...on Day One.

VALUES-BASED PRESENTATIONS

All Day One Leadership presentations (both foundational and values-based) contain three core messages:

- 1) Leadership exists in powerful moments of interpersonal impact.
- 2) Because everyone can create moments of impact, there is a form of leadership to which we all can and should aspire.
- 3) The Leadership Test is a tool that can be used to live that leadership by consciously creating moments of impact daily.

As such, each of the presentations outlined below open with an exploration of those three key points. The length and depth of that exploration is determined by whether the audience has seen one of our foundational presentations and how long it has been since they've done so. For audiences that have seen The Leadership Test or Creating Cultures of Leadership, the review tends to be less than five minutes and the keynote will contain 4-6 strategies for embodying the highlighted value. For audiences who have not seen a foundational keynote, the first 20 minutes tends to be dedicated to the core principles of the Day One approach and the keynote will usually contain 3-4 strategies. In each case, the specific strategies offered will depend on the time available, the previous presentations your audience may have seen and our pre-event consultations.

Courage: Leadership Impact in Action

- For a video Introduction to the presentation from Drew click here.
- For a short video trailer for the presentation click here.
- For audience reactions to the keynote click here.
- Value Definition: Courage is a commitment to taking action when there is the possibility of loss.
- Leadership Test Question: What have I done today that might not work, but I tried it anyway?

There's been a recurring theme in our conversations with clients over the past few months: their people are uncertain about the future, and that uncertainty is making a lot of people scared. They're worried about their health, their jobs, how much they've been forced to change and how much change is still to come. We developed this keynote to address this reality, presenting The Leadership Test as a roadmap through uncertainty: a stabilizing source of consistency that facilitates courageous decisions and generates daily momentum even when the long-term outlook is unclear.

Following the review of The Leadership Test and the development of its courage-driving question (what have I done today that might not work but I tried it anyway?), the presentation outlines how untaught lessons in our socialisation educate us out of our courage before reframing courage not as heroic acts but as a skill everyone can develop. A skill that, when applied consistently and strategically, acts as an engine to drive meaningful change in our lives, careers, studies, and communities.

Acknowledging that our instinct to equate change with the possibility of loss makes it tempting to maintain the status quo, the presentation then moves into a series of practical strategies for developing and embedding courage in our daily decisions and embracing the idea it's more important to be decisive than certain in times of upheaval and uncertainty.

The ability to innovate and change has always been important, but the last two years have forced an unprecedented amount of unplanned change on people and organizations. If you're looking for a presentation that provides your audience the perspectives, strategies and skills necessary to make positive, momentum-building decisions when our instincts tell us to "wait and see", this presentation is an ideal choice.

Audience takeaways may include*:

- How confidence is not a pre-requisite for courageous behaviour.
- A strategy to reframe failure as part of the effective execution of a plan.
- The process of "rejection therapy" and how it can strengthen courage and resilience.
- How to develop a clearly articulated set of criteria for personal and professional decision-making, and how it can provide strength and courage in the face of difficult decisions.
- The role that vulnerability and authenticity play in developing courage in yourself and others.

Specific content may vary based on time and customization factors.*

Potential Keynote Summary for External Use in Event Programmes or Websites:

"No one's interested in something you didn't do." -Gord Downie

Too many positive personal, professional and organizational changes are put off because we're afraid we will end up worse off than we are now. It's not the challenge of "making it happen" that keeps us from catalyzing change but the fear of what we might lose if it doesn't work out.

We are educated into this inaction, and in this keynote Wall Street Journal bestselling author Drew Dudley shares a series of practical strategies for developing the courage to take action when there is the possibility of loss.

You will learn:

- The distinction between confidence and courage
- Practical strategies for more effectively preparing for—and dealing with—failure
- How to identify and remove internalized barriers to personal and professional leadership
- Why failure is more powerful as a strategy than a "lesson"

Self-Respect: The Foundation of Leadership

- For a video Introduction to the presentation from Drew click here.
- For a short video trailer for the presentation click here.
- For audience reactions to the keynote click here.
- Value Definition: Self-Respect is a commitment to recognizing that when you are empty you have nothing to give.
 - Leadership Test Question: What have I done today to be good to myself?

“How many of you would say you treat yourself with the same level of respect you treat your phone?”

No hands were raised when this spontaneous question was posed to a group of executives attending one of Drew’s workshops. If you feel the same thing might happen if the question was posed to your audience, this presentation may be a great fit.

Self-Respect: The Foundation of Leadership is built on the belief that how we feel about ourselves directly impacts how we treat others. Arguing that a negative self-concept emerges from an awareness that a gap exists between the people we want to be and how we are actually behaving, this keynote positions the Leadership Test as a tool that can be used to close that gap each day.

Following the review of The Leadership Test concept and its self-respect driving question (“what have I done today to be good to myself?”), this presentation shares a series of insights into improving self-care and self-respect. To reinforce the core concept that we all play a role as leaders, the insights are not Drew’s own but rather strategies personally gathered from a wide variety of leaders, many of whom differ from the traditional “positional” model, including young children, an uber driver, a Paralympian, even a recovering addict. With each strategy and story, the audience is reminded that while leadership is about service, we cannot lead others until we can lead ourselves. The message isn’t that we all need to “do less”, but rather consciously embed behaviours that build our resilience and self-respect into our lives and work.

Easily Drew’s most personal presentation, this keynote is an ideal choice for audiences feeling burnt out or overwhelmed. If you believe your audience could benefit from being reminded that they are not alone in their frustrations and fears; and that taking care of themselves is an essential part of serving others, this presentation is a great addition to your agenda.

Audience takeaways may include*:

- The importance of adequately preparing for difficult days (both personal and professional).
- How to effectively evaluate their skill at managing multiple priorities.
- A strategy to assess which aspects of their life and work are having a negative impact on their self-esteem.
- How to more effectively balance the needs of others with their own.
- The benefits of prioritizing the development of resilience over avoiding mistakes.

Specific content may vary based on time and customization factors.*

Potential Keynote Summary for External Use in Event Programmes or Websites:

“There is no hole in your life that cannot be filled with self-respect.”

It’s on that premise leadership speaker and author Drew Dudley has built this keynote, but he knows all-to-well that fostering that self-respect is a lot easier said than done.

In 2010 Drew was fresh off delivering what would be voted one of the “15 most inspirational TED talks of all time” and traveling the world delivering keynotes that led one Oxford University professor to proclaim him “the most motivating and inspiring speaker on leadership out there right now”. While his professional career was empowering others to embrace their leadership, Drew was struggling off the stage: battling alcohol addiction, undiagnosed bipolar disorder and a lifestyle that had ballooned him to over 300 pounds.

In this keynote, Drew melds self-care insights from all over the world with his own story to present practical strategies for embedding self-care and building self-respect into your personal leadership philosophy. Over the past decade these strategies helped him achieve and maintain sobriety, lose 100 pounds, manage his mental health, and process a profound personal tragedy.

A presentation that acknowledges the dark parts of life and work with humour and compassion, this practical exploration of self-awareness, forgiveness, resilience and healing will remind you that we cannot lead others until we can lead ourselves and show you how great leaders know how to put themselves first while still serving others.

You will learn:

- How every personal and professional decision can be assessed for its impact on self-respect.
- How inaccurate your assessments of the quality of your decisions usually are.
- Strategies for more strongly embedding self-care into your personal leadership without sacrificing your impact at home or work.
- Simple daily habits that can provide strength and energy on your most difficult days.

Elevate Don't Escalate

Leading with Impact and Living with Class

- For a video Introduction to the presentation from Drew click here.
- For a short video trailer for the presentation click here.
- For audience reactions to the keynote click here.

Value Definitions and Questions:

- Impact: Impact is a commitment to creating moments that make people feel as if they are better off for having interacted with you.
 - Question: What have I done today to recognize someone else's leadership?
- Class: Class is a commitment to treating people and situations better than they deserve to be treated.
 - Question: When did I 'elevate instead of escalate' today?

Things can be a little...tense right now. Lingering impacts of the pandemic, social and political tension, and economic uncertainty have a lot of us on edge, and frustration with the world can easily translate into misplaced frustration with one other. In an environment like that it can be hard to maintain focus on creating positive daily impact and dealing with the most annoying aspects of other people's behaviour. This keynote provides the strategies necessary to stay committed to living with impact and class when circumstances make those values hard to prioritize.

Like all our presentations, this keynote focuses on how to create positive moments of impact, but we feel any speaker's credibility suffers if they offer only blind idealism and fail to recognize there are real interpersonal challenges that stand in the way of implementing any new positive process. As such, this keynote focuses on both creating moments of positive impact and strategies to deal with the reality that everyone in the audience is dealing with difficult interpersonal relationships.

Following the review of The Leadership Test and the development of its impact- and class-driving questions (what did I do today to recognize someone else's leadership & when did I 'elevate instead of escalate' today?) this keynote dives into a deeper exploration of the value of impact, offering specific strategies to create the individual moments of impact we've presented as the core of personal leadership. This includes tactics for identifying timely moments for impact and an analysis of the most effective ways to ensure positive comments are internalized by the recipient.

Transitioning from impact to class, the keynote identifies—and offers solutions to—some of the most common sources of interpersonal conflict. These can include a solution-focused approach to problem-solving, how to effectively address the role fear plays in conflict, and a simple trick for avoiding the most frustrating aspects of email communication. With each strategy the importance of elevating (seeking solutions) over escalating (attempting to win) is stressed.

If your organization would benefit from an exploration of practical strategies for creating communities that cultivate psychological safety and mutual respect for the betterment of everyone involved—this keynote may fit your needs perfectly.

Audience takeaways may include*:

- How to restructure positive comments so they land with more impact.

- The power of the process of solution-focused problem solving.
- How identifying underlying fears can de-escalate conflict.
- How to respond to the single most dangerously overused word in leadership.
- How to effectively deal with one of the most common sources of anger in the workplace.

Specific content may vary based on time and customization factors.*

Potential Keynote Summary for External Use in Event Programmes or Websites:

"It seems to me that more and more we've come to expect less and less from one another, and I think that should change." -Aaron Sorkin

At the foundation of any interpersonal or organizational dysfunction there is fear. Fear that something will be taken away or something unwanted forced upon us. The challenge is that we generally address dysfunction at the level of the behaviour it generates rather than the underlying fear, perpetuating conflict in our communities and workplaces and taking its toll on personal mental health.

In this keynote, Wall Street Journal bestselling author Drew Dudley provides practical strategies for creating communities and workplaces characterized by psychological safety and positive interpersonal impact. If you've ever sworn at your computer screen because of an email or find your fists balling up while thinking of a co-worker, this keynote will provide you with tips that help save relationships and careers.

You will learn:

- How to respond to one of the most dangerously overused word in leadership.
- The most effective way to provide someone with positive feedback.
- How to effectively deal with some of the most common sources of anger in the workplace.
- A step-by-step strategy for more effective collaborative problem solving.

“The Game” Has No Winners

Growth, Empowerment and Leading Beyond an Economy of Scarcity

- For a video Introduction to the presentation from Drew click here.
- For a short video trailer for the presentation click here.
- For audience reactions to the keynote click here.

Value Definitions and Questions:

- Growth: A commitment to increasing the capacity to add value.
 - Question: What did I do today to make it more likely someone would learn something?
- Empowerment: A commitment to acting as a catalyst for the success of others.
 - Question: How did I help someone else move closer to a goal today?

The term “add value” can either be an empty buzz term or the two most important words in leadership. This keynote focuses on how to make sure it’s the latter.

This keynote addresses one of the “untaught lessons” we internalize in the education system: we are competing with one another for scarce resources. This creates organizations and workplaces where true collaboration takes a back seat to the desire to outperform others—placing individual accomplishments above organizational success. The strategies in this presentation aim to show the audience how to focus less on becoming a high performer and more on how to become an indispensable teammate. The former focuses on outperforming others, the latter on how to ensure that everyone who works with you outperforms everyone who doesn’t.

Following the review of The Leadership Test and the development of its growth- and empowerment-driving questions (what did I do today to make it more likely someone would learn something & how did I help someone else move closer to a goal today?) this presentation provides a distinction between the two values (growth focuses on increasing a skill set while empowerment’s focus is on using those skills to help others) before focusing on strategies for ensuring growth is a part of the audience’s daily plans. Some strategies may include how to prioritize asking questions over trying to “have all the answers”, how to embrace change as essential to personal and professional development, and how to use a tactic known as the “Edge of the Bed Question” to better identify opportunities for growth.

The empowerment portion of the keynote aims to provide a real definition to the term “add value” – identifying specific value-adding behaviours and providing real-world examples of how to help others move towards their goals.

If your organization is looking to develop a culture of support and collaboration rather than one of competition, this keynote can help your audience challenge their (often deeply embedded) assumption that providing opportunities and support for others can hold them back personally. It will send your audience away seeing the things that have been portrayed traditional leadership rewards—money, influence, and respect—not as goals in and of themselves, but as the natural by-products that come to those who dedicate themselves to growing and empowering others.

Audience takeaways may include*:

- An understanding of the most significant mental roadblocks to embracing growth and empowerment as crucial leadership values.
- How to refine their skill at asking growth-driving questions.
- How to overcome a natural fear of change and make it an incremental daily reality.
- A clearer and more actionable understanding of the term “add value”.
- How to identify their most important lessons and effectively pass them on to others.

Specific content may vary based on time and customization factors.*

Potential Keynote Summary for External Use in Event Programmes or Websites:

“Don’t start chasing applause and acclaim. That way lies madness.” -Ron Swanson

From a young age we are pushed to compete with one another for limited resources: grades, school admissions, money, jobs, even respect. This belief in an “economy of scarcity” is learned although it is never explicitly taught, and the results can be seen in the interpersonal and organizational dysfunction that permeates our lives and workplaces.

In this keynote, Wall Street Journal bestselling author Drew Dudley provides a roadmap to embracing a different type of economy – one focused on personal growth and collective empowerment. Embracing this “economy of abundance” requires a fundamental shift in both mindset and action, and Dudley provides practical strategies for acting as a catalyst for that shift personally and professionally.

You will learn:

- The two most important words in leadership
- Why effective leadership relies more on questions than answers
- The three key pieces of knowledge each leader must develop
- Why “nice people finish last” and what to do about it